Prepare for some surprises, because there really was a race to the Moon in the 1960s—and it was a lot closer than you think. With the perspective of 50 years, and with insights coming from declassified Soviet and U.S. archival materials, we now know more about this story, challenging the popular narrative. Hear more from NASA’s Chief Historian, Bill Barry, at Duquesne University’s Annual History Forum.

Since the late 1960s, the Department of History has hosted the History Forum, attracting national and international scholars to address topics of current, historical and academic interest.
